In the aftermath of Mick Henleys death, his two lovers, Paul Alcott and Tono Garat, find themselves at odds. Tono has rejected Paul on the pretext that the public will find out about their love affair, thus tarnishing Micks memory; the reality is that Tono fears Paul will lose interest in him because theyre not intellectual equals. Tonos fear is compounded when Micks final novel, Momentos, is presented to Paul posthumously with a request to start a trust from the proceeds to aid artists and writers suffering from ALS. Micks only stipulation is that Tono spearhead the organization. Paul is energized by Micks request, but Tono is angry and conflicted about the challenge. After a five-month separation, they reunite, rekindling their strong physical attraction-and illuminating their many differences. As always, Micks presence lingers, intruding at unexpected times.
