Excerpt: . . . 8 University of California Publications. education Some of the Connecticut men were particularly desirous of making the new college a perennial fountain of orthodoxy. In this they had the heartiest sympathy of the faction in Massachusetts who were in active opposition to the latitudinarian tendencies already present and influential in Harvard College. There is extant a memorandum, supposed to have been drawn up by Cotton Mather, proposing that a university be erected in Connecticut by a synod called for that purpose, and that it be in fact and in administration a true school of the churches. In a letter written September 15, 1701, Increase Mather expressed the fear that the political changes then imminent would result in taking away the government of the college from those interested in its establishment. Judge Sewall and Secretary Addington, of Massachusetts, were requested to suggest the form of an...
