AN UNACADEMICAL PROCEEDING. Un sujet comique. MOLIERE. The bursar of St. Peters College having finished his matutinal meal--Anglice, his breakfast--sat contemplating a parchmentcovered book, about a yard and a half long by ten inches wide, which Promus, the college butler, had just brought in to be cast up and checked, when a loud rap at his door roused him from his unpleasant contempla-, tions. He was in hopes some would respond to his come in, who would justify him in postponing a task which he detested, and always shuffled off to the last moment. As the door opened, and a middle-aged gentleman appeared, holding by the arm, as tightly as if he was afraid he would give him the slip, a much younger gentleman, who, judging from corresponding form and feature, was evidently my son, sir, the bursar said, Promus, you must take away the batteling book; you see I am about to be engaged. Bring it up again next week. Excuse me, sir, cant I come up when these gentlemen are gone down The book has not been looked over this term, said Promus. That, sir, is no fault of mine--I am always ready to do my duty; but, if people will interrupt me in the discharge of it, the blame be on them. I shall not cry peccavi. Bring it up next week; these gentlemen may be going to interrupt me all day. Promus sighed, and removed the book, as...
