No human art is probably older than the art of story-telling. Before primitive man ever thought of fashioning his first stone axe, long before he ever conceived the possibility of scratching picture messages upon hard surfaces, he must have developed skill in narrating not only the happenings of his own day, but also the events of past time as they were handed down to him by tradition. Story-telling even in its primitive forms served several important and permanent purposes. First of all came the purpose of entertainment. This purpose the art has never neglected, and rightly for a dull story is worse than none at all. Next perhaps in importance came the historical purpose.
