Not illustrated. 1893 Excerpt: .in making their mark if they took to it professionally and devoted a life to it. The special merit of the handling of a carving tool, viewed educationally as a piece of hand-training, lies in the absence of guidance in the tool itself. It is sharpened on both bevels, and whatever purpose there is to be in the cut must be put into it by the operator. Its value has, however, already been abundantly recognised by the pioneers of such training, so much so, that one has to counsel some restraint of the whittling instinct; and to enforce the necessity of teaching also the proper application of ornament, and its reasonable distribution in relation to structural forms, and to the available time of the worker. We have already had what I may call a nibble at the carver s craft over our flower sticks, and perhaps the next step should be the Scandinavian chip carving, of which I need say little, as there is an excellent introduction to its practice by Miss Rowe; but again let me say the word, restraint; one can have too much chip carving, and it is chiefly pleasant in smallish articles and in contrast to considerable surfaces of plain wood. But another and much more interesting kind of carving hails from the same lands, consisting of finely flowing and interlaced patterns on a slightly sunk ground, which is usually left rather wavy or faceted, as if cut with a knife or...
